11 ASU academics recognized as world’s most influential researchers over the past decade

Research highlights ASU academics' groundbreaking research and impact.

The list includes Luis R. Gomez-Mejia, a professor in the Department of Supply Chain Management in the W. P. Carey School of Business. He has led the study of the upstream side of supply chains for decades and is known for his focus on family business and whether any unique attributes help managers and employees establish their roles in an organization, and how they process change. His research involves advancements. His research involves 2D materials and utilizing these materials' properties in new advancements. His research involves next-generation advancements. His research involves novel approaches to the treatment and occurrence of emerging contaminants in various bodies of water, and the risks nanomaterials can create. His research team is now examining how artificial intelligence can help alleviate global water issues.

Sefaattin Tongay, an assistant professor in the School for Engineering of Matter, Transport and Energy in the Ira A. Fulton Schools of Engineering. Tongay's work is focused on next-generation energy in the Ira A. Fulton Schools of Engineering. Tongay's work is focused on next-generation ener...